"Clean! When I grow up, the wind turbines will be colourful and electricity will only be produced from sun, wind and water."

Lina, 10 years old

European countries have never produced as much electricity from renewable energies as they had in 2022.

"My children only know happy cows and happily clucking chickens."

Esra, 12 years old

Meat production in Germany fell for the sixth year in a row in 2022. More than ever before. Around eight per cent less meat was produced than in 2021.

"Three-day weekends, that's what I want. Then I can always sleep in and play with my friends all day."

Levi, 9 years old

This doesn't have to be a pipe dream. Recent studies show that the 4-day week is also becoming increasingly popular with employers in many countries. Employees are more rested, more motivated and are absent less often.

"Freedom for the hamsters! My children no longer have to look at the hamsters in the zoo."

David, 8 years old

The field hamster is almost extinct in North Rhine-Westphalia. The federal state of Hesse has already successfully managed to improve the conditions in nature to such an extent that the field hamster is once again ploughing through the fields and loosening up the soil.

"Soon everything will be unpackaged. I won't have to take the rubbish away so often."

Adam, 9 years old

More and more supermarkets are already opting for unpackaged fruit and vegetables. Many disposable products are also being abolished.

"I think it's great that the big kids are listening to the little ones too."

Emilia, 7 years old

There is already a good example of this. A huge gas field was to be developed off a small group of islands in Australia. But the Munupi tribe filed a lawsuit against the authorisation. The Australian Federal Court ruled in their favour. Now whales, manatees and turtles swim there in peace.

"When I grow up, I'll invent a heating system that costs nothing and is good for the environment."

Ava, 11 years old

What sounds like a pipe dream already exists in Scotland. A cultural centre there has been opened with the "Bodyheat" system. The body heat of guests dancing in a hall is stored in the ground. This is later available for heating. So much heat is generated that no other heating energy is required.

"In my future, we will find people everywhere who think of others and take care of our earth. No one is sad and alone anymore."

David, 11 years old

There are already people today who are making the world a little better with good and creative ideas. In Australia, for example, a 109-year-old man knitted woollen jumpers for penguins affected by an oil leak. Thanks to these jumpers, they don't swallow the toxic oil when they clean themselves.

I'm sure you've read all the good news from the children and realised that these are not just dreams. There are so many good and beautiful things happening in our world every day because of all of us. We can be confident, pat ourselves on the back and look forward to the future.

Time to jump into the air!
